Oral Narratives: An Arts Integration Link to Motor Planning and Written Language

A student's narrative language skills can be an outward reflection of their cognition regarding thinking and organizing skills. Arts integrated instructional strategies can support motor planning, written language skills, align with UDL, and offer learning supports for neurodiverse thinkers.

About Jamie Gomes, M.S., CCC-SLP

Jamie began her career as a Speech Language Pathologist [SLP] during the 2011/12 school year in the public school setting. She has volunteered on various committees with the California Speech and Hearing Association [CSHA] from 2012 to 2018, including the Diversity Committee, with 2 years of that time serving as Co-Chair of the Social Committee to support the CSHA Annual Convention.

Jamie has background experiences as a Program Manager in the public school setting, and with providing services to students in the: General Education programs, ARTs Integration Magnet School Program, Level 1-3 Special Day Class programs, and students receiving supports through Resource Instructional programs in the public school setting. She currently supports students at the Preschool Autism and Assessment Center for Stockton Unified School District. In addition to supporting the community in public schools, Jamie currently provides early intervention supports for 0-3 year olds in their home setting. For close to a decade now, Jamie has been a mentor for SLPs during their Clinical Fellowship Year and Required Professional Experience years, as well as for graduate degree students obtaining their Masters Degree in Speech Language Pathology and students obtaining their Speech Language Pathology Assistant licensure.
